My Dear Collage Student,

I don't typically ask anything of anyone, but I am asking now that you read this discourse, every word, and that you consider what I am sharing with you to be coming from someone you have known all your life to be a critical thinker, an honest person, and a person whom you can trust.

First, I make note that most of my life is behind me now. Whatever I have remaining I consider to be gravy. I ask that you read this because it addresses your future, not mine. I am going to try to condense decades of accumulated knowledge into a single commentary. Please bear with me.

I was born in a unique generation, a demographic labeled "Boomers". You may or may not know what that means; we were the children of the generation dubbed the "Greatest Generation". My parents were raised in the Great Depression. They had no idea what prosperity or abundance or excess was. They grew up in what we would now refer to as austerity and yet, in spite of all they lacked, they made the best of it. And just as they were blooming into their young adult years, full of their dreams and hopes and plans, World War II kicked those dreams to the curb.

You have not grown up in austerity. You have never known the collective mind-set of rationing food and supplies or doing without altogether. You have grown up in an era of abundance and prosperity. I pause to point out these pleasant circumstances were bought and paid for by the blood and sacrifice of your great-grandparents for my generation and you.

But my generation, the children born to the young people who had put their futures on hold and managed to survive the horrors of war and returned to finally begin their lives, my generation said, wait a minute! I grew up in the Civil Rights Era, I would have been at Kent State when the protesting students were shot, if I had not taken another road. I witnessed the Hippie Age, The Age of Aquarius, the Love Generation. Our mantra was "trust no one over thirty" and "question all authority". My generation was the first ever American youth to say, "hell no, we won't go!" to the powers who determined war in a small Asian country called Viet Nam was our duty. For what? we asked out loud. But many of my peers did go, and many never returned to live their dreams and goals.

This is real, and this is always a looming possibility for any generation.

And my generation realized this and decided it was time to think individually, rather than collectively, to challenge stream of consciousness. And thus my generation, for all the bad things that it produced, promoted and encouraged a variety of free-thinkers, from one end of the spectrum to the other. From societal drop outs who formed organic communes to executives who created massive technological empires that changed the entire world, for better or worse.

For all our differences, the one thing we all believed in was American Exceptionalism. The rights, as afforded to us, as a people, by our Constitution, to be allowed to have our own opinions and to be able to speak them. To set our own goals and paths and then follow them at will according to our skills and abilities. To succeed or fail.

What I, and many of my generation, can see is that these rights, the rights that have been the foundation of the greatness that has been this country for nearly three centuries, are rapidly being removed from us and I, in one last breath, as a card carrying Boomer, must protest one more time.

I have no idea what kind of education you have been given, I don't know whether or not you were taught the real history of the rise of Hitler in Germany. Many of your generation have no idea who Hitler was or vaguely recall something from modern history class. But there are still people who are alive today who were there, who can tell the story. But who is listening? Their voices have been drowned out by the siren calls of vague emotional terms like: good, fair, right. Words that inspire and stir passion but have no real meaning or can easily be redefined to suit an agenda.

It is a painful reality that the hardest earned truths always fade away with time. Subsequent generations, more interested in the now and the future, rarely know the real lessons to be learned from historical events, i.e., no culture or civilization, regardless how strong and established, is safe from being destroyed from within. In fact, history teaches us that every great failed civilization was never conquered by outside forces, but rather from apathy and neglect by the masses as the internal foundations were quietly decimated which inevitably caused collapse.

They Thought They Were Free

There is a book everyone who cares about what was once great about America should read. It is called They Thought They Were Free, by Milton Mayer. The following is a profound review on this book:

Review on Amazon: They Thought They Were Free by Milton Mayer. [2]

Mayer, a Jew on Sabbatical in post-WW-II Kronenberg, sets his goal as that of better understanding the life-story of the ordinary German under National Socialism.

As he tells the story, Nazism was not just a political system or just an ideology it was a worldview peculiarly suited for and congruent with the German Post WW-I temperament and mentality. In the aftermath of the much-hated Versailles Treaty, Nazism arrived on the scene just in time to not just conquer the minds of both little and big Germans but to overwhelm them. Mayer's phrase has described it nicely: German enthusiasm for Nazism was clearly a case of "little men-gone wild."

The true value of this book and hence Mayer's most valuable contribution has been to draw a graphic conceptual picture of how the system of Nazism worked as seen at ground level by ten ordinary Germans and from the interior of German society: To a man, they all agreed that it brought them untold economic success, bound them patriotically and politically into a coherent cultural unit, restored the nation's pride and gave all Germans renewed reasons for hope in the future.

Given this rosy and very much interior and insulated backdrop, it is no wonder there was no basis for ordinary Germans to see (or even to be able to perceive) Nazi excesses, or to see Nazism itself, as an inherently evil system until it was too late.

This was true in part because all Germans already had community permission to hate Jews. The excesses, reserved mostly for Jews, thus seemed normal and in any case were always introduced in carefully orchestrated, slowly escalating, but easily digestible bites. This was done specifically to stay below the radar of the everyday German conscience -- so as to never assault German sensibilities too abruptly. Even the most alert of Germans and the least anti-Semitic Germans were lulled to sleep by this strategy.

But more importantly, because all Germans were wedded to the Nazi worldview through its benefits, both tangible and intangible, there were few incentives for them to "rock the boat" by pointing to its excesses. Dissension was left for victims and outsiders to engage in. However, being identified as an outsider or as a dissenter, at a minimum, could ensure social exclusion and a slow social death; and if one were very unlucky, it could mean disappearance into a concentration camp, or even a swift bullet to the temple.

Ordinary Germans thus were willing contributors to their own self-imposed trap: They needed the community's approval on its own terms. Sometimes this meant turning a blind eye to community sanctioned criminal activity, such as was the case in the event that set off a cascading sequence of programs against Jews, Crystal-nacht. Ordinary Germans did not want to approve of the criminal behavior involved, but was it not the community to which they were bound that decided what was criminal and who should be rewarded and punished for community-defined criminal behavior? It is easy enough for outsiders to exaggerate the actual relationship between man and state under tyranny, but from the inside, it is always made to seem normal and seamless.

Like a thief in the night, tyranny always descends upon sleeping societies in a cloak of patriotic conformity. It attacks when one is unguarded psychologically and least wary of an assault. By the time the citizen is prepared to raise a dissenting voice, in the name of state security, his throat (and presumably his vocal cords) have already been cut and he has been rendered mute. Once the national conscience has been drugged, sedated, or put to sleep, it is difficult to reawaken it.

Since there are no political systems that are entirely insulated against criminal activity, corruption or evil, only healthy, timely, vigorous and authentic dissent can act as an antidote to the evil inherent in tyrannical political systems like Fascism and Nazism.

Without drawing too fine a distinction, it is difficult to miss the many parallels between contemporary American society and 1933-1939 German society.

You should understand by now, that the administration that has been allowed to take over our government is the culmination of a plan that has been slowly put in place, increment by increment, piece by piece, over a period of many years, not unlike what happened in Germany. And it is the apathy and disregard of the distracted masses, more consumed with abundance and social twitter than what is happening to the country filled with those distractions, that will be the end of this once great country.

Please note, there is no country like America who can step in and intervene for us like America did for Germany.

If you believe that this coming election is about politics, left or right, democrat or republican, racism, women's rights, gay rights and/or "safety", then you have plugged into the stream of consciousness that has been carefully created for you.

Welcome to the Matrix - life imitating art.

If you think I am biased or old-fashioned and I am easily dismissed because of this, you are also dismissing that I am a Boomer who still believes in the American Exceptionalism that fought for Civil Rights. Further, I still want that to continue, for your sake, if nothing else, and your children and their children because Civil Rights are for every citizen. And I believe that fundamental change, as promised in 2008, is not about upholding the concept of Americans being exceptional, it's about amalgamating us into something that is more controllable.

If we make it to November 6, 2012, as the drums of the war to end all wars are beating loudly enough to threaten an interruption to, your generation will experience the most significantly important election in American history. You don't have to like or believe in a party, a platform, or a man. All you have to know is that we have been given but two choices. I have been privileged to vote in twelve presidential elections in my lifetime. Nearly half of which I cast my vote, not for a candidate but against him.

How will you vote?

You actually have three choices:

1. Don't vote and by default cast your lot to those who are already in place with intent to radically change and ultimately destroy America as an ideology.
2. Vote for the current administration because rhetoric sounds good enough.
3. Vote against the current administration

I end this by inserting an essay by Daniel Greenfield. He is a clarion voice in the wilderness. I know this is long and your time is valuable, but, again, I am asking, as your Meema, to take the time to read it because, a little knowledge can't hurt anyone, especially a college student full of hopes, dreams and goals.

Because, above all, I want for you to be able to realize those things as I was able to in my lifetime.

Love, Meema

PS I am sorry if I did not pass on my Boomer mentality to you. I guess I thought you wouldn't need it. I apologize that I let abundance lull us all into apathy. I repent now and offer up this one last effort to make restitution.

The Most Divisive Campaign in American History - By Daniel Greenfield [3]

In 1980, when President Reagan asked Americans, "Are you better off now than you were four years ago?" it was still possible to campaign on a theme as simple as the job performance of the other guy. But now, 32 years later, the campaign hinges on a much more fundamental split among the voting population.

Romney appeals to voters who are dissatisfied with the last four years. Obama appeals to voters who are dissatisfied with America.

This basic gap was obscured in the 2008 campaign by the window trappings of inspiration. Among all the plastic pillars and stolen quotes from poets who stole them from sermons, it was harder to see that the underlying theme of the campaign was dissatisfaction with America. But in 2012, Obama can no longer run as a reformer or an optimist.

The coalition that he committed to last year is a coalition of those who are unhappy with America, not in the last four years, but in the last two-hundred years. Its core is composed of groups that fear democracy and distrust the will of the people. There is no optimism here, but a deeply rooted pessimism about human nature and the country as a whole. It is the Democratic Party's coalition against democracy.

After 2010, the numbers were crunched, and it was clear that Obama and the Democrats could not win a mainstream campaign. Instead, they targeted narrow groups, stirred up conflicts over issues aimed at that group, whether it was union pensions, racism or birth control. There was no more pretense of a national election, only a frenzied rush to polarize as many groups as possible and join them together into an acrimonious coalition, not so much for anything, as against Republicans.

There isn't any inspiration here. Just paranoia over everything from gay marriage to abortion to racial profiling to illegal immigration. A dozen illegal benefits being handed out with the explicit threat that they will be lost if Romney wins. A dozen mini-civil wars being stirred up to divide Americans and set them at each other's throats for the benefit of the Obama campaign.

From Occupy Wall Street to Wisconsin, from Trayvon Martin to Chick-fil-A, the goal of these manufactured conflicts has been to divide and conquer the electorate by emphasizing group rights over individual economic welfare.

Obama can't win on the economy. He can't win on foreign policy. He can't win on any aspect of his administration. All he can do is stir up violence and then promise to heal the country in his second term while winking to all the representatives of the grievance groups. It's not a new game, but the Democratic Party has never played it quite this badly in a national election. And if it succeeds, then national politics will have finally been reduced to the level of a Chicago election.

We were expected to believe that the typical Obama voter in 2008 was hoping for a better country, but in 2012 there is no more hope, only hate and fear. The typical Obama voter is not acting as an American, but as a representative of an entitled group looking to secure and expand those entitlements at the expense and the detriment of the country at large.

To vote for Obama after years of grotesque economic mismanagement that has no precedent in history, that exceeds the worst actions of Andrew Jackson or Ulysses S. Grant, is not the instinct of an American, but a selfish greedy looter scrambling to grab a few dinner rolls off the tray while the ship is going down. There is no policy justification for voting for a man with the worst economic and foreign policy record in the country's history. There is no American justification for voting for him. Only the UnAmerican motivation of carving up a dying country into group fiefdoms privileging identity politics over the common good.

This is an UnAmerican campaign. It is an Anti-American campaign. It is a campaign by those who hate and fear what America was and who resent having to care about anyone outside their own group. Its group jingoism, its dog whistles and special privileges are repulsive and cynical, treating the people of a great nation like a warren of rats eager to sell each other out for a prize from the Cracker Jack box of identity politics entitlements.

There is not a single Obama voter anywhere in the land who believes that another four years of him will make this country better. Not a single one from coast to coast. No, what they believe is that he will make the country a worse place for those people that they hate. That he will have four more years to sink their ideas deeper in the earth, regardless of how many families go hungry and how many fathers kill themselves because they can no longer take care of their families. What they believe is that Obama will grant their group more special privileges and the rest of the country can go to hell.

In his DNC keynote address in 2004, Obama said, "There is no Black America or White America or Latino America or Asian America, there is just the United States of America." And now he has completely disavowed it. He isn't campaigning to lead the United States of America, instead he is running for the presidency of a dozen little Americas, Trayvon Martin America, Abortion America, Illegal Alien America, Sharia America, Gay Marriage America, Starbucks America and any others you can think of. And if he can collect enough of these little Ameri- cas together, then he may get the privilege of running the United States of America into the ground for another four years.

Obama has never been the President of the United States of America. He has been the president of Washington, D.C., of Wall Street and of Solyndra. He has been the President of Green America and of Chicago. He has been the President of Warren Buffett, George Soros, Bill Gates, Penny Pritzker and James Crown. He is the President of George Clooney, Harvey Weinstein and Anne Hathaway. And now, facing disaster, he still isn't running to be President of a country, but of a dozen little countries with money from freshly bailed out Green America and Wall Street, not to mention Hollywood.

The Obama campaign is not accidentally divisive. It did not stumble into divisiveness. It is not even divisive as a byproduct of its real aims. Divisiveness is its aim. Divisiveness is the only way that a divisive administration can hold on to power. The anger and the violence are not an accident, they are the whole point. Set one group against another, feed the hate, massage the grievances and very soon there is no longer a nation but a handful of quarreling groups being roped into a mutual alliance to reelect their lord protector whose appeal is that of the outsider becoming the insider.

Bain is a metaphor whose details don't truly matter. The target audience for that swill doesn't really care where Romney was when a steel plant was shut down. It doesn't care that like so many private equity bigwigs, the man who actually was in charge is one of Obama's bundlers. This isn't about truth, it's about menace. The Bain message is that Romney is a man who takes things away. That is the image that the UnAmerican alliance is meant to take away. The ominous sense that Obama's era of giving them things is about to come to a close and Romney's era of taking away things will begin.

It doesn't take much prompting for the Unamericans to come to this conclusion. Thieves are always looking over their shoulders. They always expect to have their ill-gotten gains taken away from them. And that is Obama's true achievement. Like Tammany Hall, he has corrupted a massive section of the population and made it complicit in his criminality. What the old political machines did to cities or small groups of vested interests, the Zero has done to tens of millions, if not a hundred million people, who want him in power not because they think he's the best man for the job, but because he's their crook. The middle man for a crime ring that begins with him and ends with them.

The true insidious evil of the man is that he is the face of a machine of power and privilege that turns Americans into UnAmericans, that corrupts and degrades every ideal and principle, suborns every office and picks every pocket, while wrapping that thievery in the flag and every bit of history that it can filch. The Hussein Way is the clearest expression of the rot at the heart of the Democratic Party, the marriage of leftist agitation and powermongering with the old urban political machines for a level of abuse usually seen only in banana republics.

The abomination in Washington is a welfare-state technocracy that mixes crony capitalism with radical social policy. It steals from everyone and gives back to some. It plays the game of divide and conquer with the panache of marketing executives knowing that the worse the economy is, the more likely everyone is to look in everyone else's mouth. Its worst aspect is its insistence on cloaking its cynicism as righteousness, wrapping every ugly means in the glorious flag of the ends when the truth is that its means are its ends.

Divide and conquer isn't just a means to the greater end of giving Zero Hussein another four years. And perhaps another four years after that. It's also the end. Every tyrant from Joseph Stalin to Saddam Hussein knew that a divided people are easier to rule. The more you divide them, the less likely they are to give you any trouble when you're raiding their last pennies to pay for the latest Green gimmick that your billionaire backers have thrown up all over Wall Street.

Obama is the ultimate Post-American figure passing himself off as the embodiment of all that is truly American. But the UnAmericans got the real message in 2008 and in 2012 there is no other message. There is no more hope and faith, and the ones who have been waiting for are the UnAmericans who think that they are about to come into their own, when they are little more than pawns being used to rob and destroy a great nation.

This is the Post-American, Anti-American and UnAmerican campaign to divide up, carve up and toss aside the laws and traditions of the United States and replace them with the power of arrogance. It is the last stand of a beleaguered nation facing barbarians inside its gate. Every previous election was a contest between two American candidates who wanted to pre-empt over the United States.

This is an election contest between the United States and an emerging Post-American order. That entity will be an American EU run by unelected bureaucrats, governed by politically correct technocrats and upheld by corrupt financial pirates disguising the collective bankruptcy with numbers games so elaborate that they make every billion-dollar con game and pyramid scheme that has come before seem as simple as child's play.

The entity is already here. Its czars are running things in D.C., and its judges are dismantling both constitutional government and democratic elections. It creates a crisis and then makes sure that it doesn't go to waste. It has excellent design skills and terrible planning skills. It has all the money in the world and none at all. It is the Post-American America, and 2012 is its big referendum. The one that will decide whether this Post-American America, this horrid graft of E.U. governance and Mussolini economics, Soviet propaganda and FDR volunteerism, Tammany populist criminality and U.N. foreign policy will be permitted to devour the United States of America.

Obama cannot win an American election. But he isn't running in an American election. He's running in a Post-American election.
